Gemalto is one of the world's largest suppliers of highly secure ID cards embracing main functions: identity, driver's license, and border control. Gemalto's smart card technology employs a microprocessor that can securely store a high-resolution picture of the holder, blood type, drivers' credentials, restrictions, etc. to enable digital signature. The chip also contains the history of drivers' fines, allowing the transit authorities to easily monitor drivers' behavior on the roads and could, in the future, be used for insurance companies to calculate policy costs. Fingerprint and facial picture of the driver are encoded in the card body. The chip is contained in a sophisticated card body with specific security features that makes it difficult to copy and counterfeit reducing identity theft and fraud. Law enforcement can verify licensed drivers via handheld readers or terminals.

Microsoft is the world's largest software company, providing a variety of products that currently benefit AAMVA as well as AAMVA's member organizations. Many states' DMV organizations presently use Microsoft operating systems at both their server (e.g. Windows Server 2003) and desktop (e.g. Windows XP and Vista) computing tiers. Additionally, some states' core DMV business-specific applications are hosted on and built using these operating systems and associated Microsoft server products such as SQL Server and BizTalk Server. Additionally, Microsoft Web Services technologies are presently used for inter-systems communications and integration.

The VeriSol Vehicle Insurance Verification (VeriSol VIV) software performs real-time verification of vehicle insurance using web services based on the IICMVA specifications, with enhancements as required by each jurisdiction. If the insurance company of record provides an "Unconfirmed" response to a valid request or if a cancellation transaction is received, VeriSol VIV can query all insurance companies. Unlike the current reporting model utilized by many jurisdictions, online verification bypasses the need to identify a match between insurance carrier and DMV information and eliminates the associated costs. Accurate responses are provided because authorized requesters go directly to the source - the insurance companies themselves.
